

Women suing police chiefs launch website

Rob Evans

The group of women who are taking legal action against police chiefs has launched a new website.

The website has been set up to support the eight women - it can be found here.

The women say they were duped into forming long-term, intimate relationships with five undercover police officers. For more background on their case, see this, this and this.

The women are suing police chiefs as they say that the "deeply degrading" deceit caused them psychiatric and psychological injuries including depression, trauma, anxiety, anger and a difficulty to trust people again.

The five undercover officers include Mark Kennedy, Bob Lambert and Jim Boyling.

Seeing these messages is annoying. We know that. (Imagine what it's like writing them ...)

But it's also extremely important. One of the Guardian's greatest assets is its reader-funded model.

1. Reader funding means we can cover what we like. We're not beholden to the political whims of a billionaire owner. No one can tell us what not to say or what not to report.

2. Reader funding means we don't have to chase clicks and traffic. We're not desperately seeking your attention for its own sake: we pursue the stories that our editorial team deems important, and believe are worthy of your time.

3. Reader funding means we can keep our website open, allowing as many people as possible to read quality journalism from around the world – especially people who live in places where the free press is in peril.

At the moment, the Guardian's work is funded by just 2.4% of our regular readers. If you're in the other 97.6%, appreciate our work and believe that good journalism is important to protecting democracy in an age of misinformation, please consider supporting the Guardian today.

We value whatever you can spare, but a monthly contribution makes the most impact, enabling greater investment in our most crucial, fearless journalism. As our thanks to you, we can offer you some great benefits. (Including making these messages go away.) We've made it very quick to set up, so we hope you'll consider it. Thank you.
